For more than two decades Susan Veatch Cantrell honored Wabash men and their families by telling their stories with her words: feature articles in Wabash Magazine, official citations and tributes, stories about students, and even regular newsletters to parents. They were eloquent essays, sometimes touching or leavened with a sense of humor, that captured the essence of a person. Susan's love affair with Wabash started early. She grew up in Crawfordsville with a singing voice so fine and clear that it was often likened to the sound of a bell. She even had the lead in the Wabash College production of Guys and Dolls when she was in high school. Later, as a sophomore music major at Indiana University, she decided she didn't want a career in music. Her voice teacher reportedly cried when she told him. A determined individual, Susan left Bloomington for Washington, D.C., with no job and no connections. She started as a librarian in a mobile library truck, then joined the staff of Republican Charles Percy of Illinois and worked her way up to writing his speeches. She went on to have her own broadcasting career at WCBS radio in New York City and WBBM in Chicago. Through it all, Susan's genuine interest in people, their lives, and the things that mattered to them earned her many, many friends-from farmers to judges, from prominent politicians such as New York Governor Mario Cuomo and CEOs, to the woman who lived next door. Susan's love for Wabash is clearly demonstrated and anchored in her philanthropy as she knew that Wabash men will go on to shape and change the world for the better, something she cared deeply about.

After he received his MBA from Indiana University, Tom became attracted to the idea of flying as a profession. Due to the Vietnam conflict there was a shortage of pilots for the commercial side of flying. TWA was starting a new program which they dubbed "the zero timers" as they had to learn to fly from literally the ground up. Tom was accepted and began his career in commercial aviation while he served in the Naval Reserves. Early in his flying career he met a flight attendant, Janet Lucille Gustafson, another Indianan. They were married in 1969. They were both domiciled in Los Angeles California and ended up flying all over the US and the world. He retired as a senior captain at TWA/American. After medical school, he pursued an internal medicine and hematology/medical oncology residency and fellowship.
